

ECONOMICS

Economics is the study of allocating scarce resources among competing needs. Drexel's economics concentration is designed for two groups of students: those who wish to prepare for advanced degrees in the field, and those who want a sound business education with a focus on economics. The program places particular emphasis on the application of theory toward the solution of particular problems in such areas as international trade, money and finance, consumer activities, economic development, and other areas.

Although housed in the LeBow College of Business, the economics major is a free-standing major with different requirements in the liberal arts and sciences and a deeper, more complete coverage of economics than any other curriculum. Students majoring in economics benefit from complementary studies in one or more areas, depending on their interests and long-term plans. Economics graduates are employed in private industry and by many government agencies. A significant number of students go on to do graduate work in law as well as economics.
