For centuries, minoritized communities in the U.S. have labored under the admonition to "not borrow trouble," to refrain from questioning the systems that structure and shape their lived realities. However, civil rights icon and Congressman, John Lewis, had a very different perspective. He believed that we had to "get in good trouble...to redeem the soul of America".

Critical Conversations in Urban Education (CCUE) will host a social justice leadership summit to mark our 10th anniversary, by convening scholars, teachers, researchers, students, community stakeholders, and educational innovators to borrow "good trouble."

Join us as we shake the very foundations of our systems. We will gather virtually to explore and reimagine newer, more equitable approaches to P-20 education that are built upon frameworks of social justice and inclusion. This summit will feature the innovative and transformative uses of platforms and formats to facilitate critical dialogues about current issues in urban education.
